Detectives Following Clues in Murder of Viola Boylan Get on Track of Other Little Ones Similarly Missing.

The murder of Viola Boylan will probably result in a general inspection of small candy stores, ice cream parlors and wine shops in the Italian sections of the city. Most of these places are conducted legiti mately, but many are utilized by depraved men and boys for the purpose of luring little girls. The amazing extent of the operations of these men and the bodness with which they seek victims is startlingly disclosed in the revelations that have followed the Boylan tragedy.

Capt. McCafferty has assigned detectives to look up all the little girls whose disappearance from home has been reported within the past two months and who remain missing. The head of the Detective Bureau fears that some of them may have met the fate of the Boylan child.

What more tragic and potent appeal than that of this heartbroken mother, I thought, as Mrs. Boylan, mother of nine-year-old Viola Boylan, stretched her workworn hands across the little white-draped bier, where lay the pitful little body of her murdered child, and spoke, gift only for the future of other little girls.

Teached the bakery.

A pathodic touch to little Viola's death is that to-day she was to have attended gradualing exercises with some of her girl friends. Her mother had been working at night to get a little white froze in order. The Little froze gray answer another purpose now.

Nervously she waited for the girl's return, and when she at last appeared to announce that the policeman would not come the mother distractedly sent her to look for another. Then it was too little, for the two men, noticing the white, drawn face of the mother and child, suspected their intention and escaped.
